

INTERNATIONAL DOCTORAL SCHOOL IN HUMAN DEVELOPMENT AND LABOUR MARKET LAW

The Doctoral School lasts three years and offers an interdisciplinary educational and research pathway built around two options:

- human resource law and the labour market
- educational and organisational sciences

The main research areas are:

- career guidance and the school-university-employment transition
- initial and in-service teacher training
- business, learning and training
- human development and manual thinking
- human development, labour and professional ethics
- apprenticeship of the right/duty to educational and training, advanced and vocational training
- training centred on the learning-process outcome and the verification of competences
- the quality of personal services
- the training record and portfolio of competences
- training in formal, informal and non-formal settings
- new epistemological, methodological and pedagogic perspectives on teaching
- new skills for new jobs and new markets;
- labour law, types of contract and social security
- inclusive training and the labour market
- human capital and vocational training in SMEs
- the development of human capital in the state sector
- labour market law and public employment
- outsourcing, personal safeguards and human capital enhancement